SHIPS' LIGHTS. A letter printed in the Times on the subject of the late fatal collision between the Vills du Havre and the Lechearn raises, or rather revives, a question which we trust the Board of Trade will carefully consider. The writer al Kenealy called the attention of the jury to the leges, and with much show of reason as he puts the mutter, that the Ville du Haure has fullen a lighting sailing ships." The rule of the road at Shipowners' Association have already reported to the Board of Trade against the present practice, concluding with the remark "it is abanrd that the vessel whose business it is to get out of the way should be the last to know what she has to avoid." More recently the Glasgow Chamber of Commerce memorialized the Board, suggesting that sailing ships should carry one light at the masthead besides the coloured ones, and steamers for the sake of distinction two; but this memorial was also disregarded. The present, however, seems a peculiarly favourable time for reconsidering it.
